As you would expect during these colder months, most of our showroom visitors this time of year are shopping for fireplaces, fireplace inserts, or wood stoves. Not only does our showroom have a wide assortment of operating units on display, we have experienced staff who can answer their questions.

While some shoppers come in with specific questions regarding specific products, the majority of folks haven't yet gotten that far in the process. Instead, they are after general information—on a variety of fireplace-related topics. In writing this article for R&A Magazine, I thought I'd share some of our most common questions and, of course, our answers.

What is the most popular type of fireplace you sell? Wood, coal, pellet, gas, or electric? And why?

For us it is overwhelmingly gas, probably over 90% of our total sales are gas. Why? First, they are extremely easy to use, second with the price of gas today it most times costs less than wood pellets. Natural gas is especially economical with all the local gas being extracted today.

How safe is a gas fireplace compared to other fossil fuels?

It is the safest if it is installed correctly. It is important to have it installed in accordance to the manufacturer's specifications for maximum performance and appearance, and should be installed by a certified firm.

Can I use my fireplace in a power outage?

Yes, while most of today's fireplaces need constant power most are equipped with a battery-backup system to work throughout a power outage.

What type of vent system do they need?

Most all of today's fireplace use what is called a direct vent system. This type has a dual-vent system, one part of the pipe brings fresh combustion air into the firebox and the other part takes the flue gases out. It is not dependent on room air for combustion and does not need to vent to the top of the house roof like a traditional chimney. A direct vent will create its own draft independent from the outside natural drafting that a wood stove requires.

What is the difference between a traditional, fullview, and a linear fireplace?

A traditional fireplace has louvers on top and bottom of the viewing glass and has the controls behind the louvers. A fullview has glass from top to bottom with the controls tucked in the side to give a much larger view of the flame and logs. A linear fireplace has a shorter but much wider viewing area, usually around 16" high by 36" - 72" long.

by the builder when my home was built. It does not provide much heat and lets in a lot of cold air. Is their a solution other than removing the mantel, stonework, etc.?

Yes, we actually specialize in this type of fix. We have a system in place where we can remove your old fireplace, insulate the frame housing, and install a high efficiency Mendota fireplace without removing your existing granite, stonework, or mantel. In most cases, we can complete the work in one day. We can also install new fireplaces with stone, granite, etc, even if you never had a fireplace. LanChester Grill & Hearth is your one-stop shop.

What brands do you carry?

In gas it is Mendota, DaVinci, and Fireplace X. Wood products are Lopi. Electric products are Dimplex.

What is this DaVinci fireplace I've been hearing about?
